In Times Of Low Occupancy, Variable Speed HVAC Aids Efficiency

In the face of COVID-19, low or no building occupancy coupled with the need to increase outdoor air into a facility presents a challenge to many facility management teams. Variable speed technology, which is available in office applications large and small, provides some solutions to this distinct set of challenges. Unlike constant speed systems, variable speed ones can run between 20% and 100% capacity, effectively matching HVAC load to the building's actual demand.

Did You Know?

Did you know an overwhelming majority of millennials say they will feel safer returning to the office and hotels with access to real-time, transparent information on Indoor Air Quality (IAQ)? Real-time IAQ information would make 68% of millennials feel safest even when compared to annual certifications and one-time health and wellness audits.

In addition, a new survey identifies IAQ as a driver for economic growth and estimates improving IAQ in offices could add as much as $20 billion annually to the U.S. economy.
